|| S, the.

S The Latin capital is taken with very little, or no, variation from the ancient Greek alphabet, and is at least of as great antiquity, as that of the Scythian bow (Σ); and from this drawn into a smaller form is made s, which is used only as a final both in Greek and Latin, except in the compendary note s for στ. The Greeks have another, but less, ancient figure of this letter, viz. C, from which the smaller initial and medial C is sometimes used. The Scythian bow is taken from the Phœnician alphabet without variation; as that is from the Hebrew ש sin, by drawing it in a jacent, instead of an erect, form. Hence the Dorians, who perhaps immediately received it from the Hebrews, as Herodotus and Pindar acquaint us, called this letter σάν san, though the Ionians called it σῆγμα sigma, from the Chaldean סמך simcha, by transposing the second and third letters: which opinion is made more probable by the small form of the Greek sigma σ, it being no other than the Hebrew ש turned to the right hand in complaisance to the western way of writing. But there are strong reasons to think ש samech only a secondary letter, substituted for ש sin, the better to distinguish it from ש schin; wherein they had done wisely, provided they had exterminated ש sin, which now seems supernumerary, because both these letters ש and ש, have one and the same sound, as appeareth from the Ephraimish pronunciation of Shibboleth. And hence we may account for the different Greek names of this letter, san being so called from sin, before samech was introduced; and sigma from samech, after such introduction. But to proceed: the Greeks admitt this letter into no class in the distribution of their alphabet, whether in honour to it, as being invested with a despotick power peculiar to itself, or in dishonour, looking upon it only as a substitute and attendant on the rest, is uncertain; but I should think the latter, since its servile offices are so very many in declining their nouns, and their verbs more especially in conjugateing. For in all future tenses of verbs baryton, and all the tenses derived from thence, with their participles in every conjugation, voice, and mode, this letter is servile; being explicit, implicit, or potential, in them all. And this servile use probably may have been the reason why some among the Greeks have accounted it only an aspiration; in which number was Plato the philosopher, who calls it the breathing letter. And indeed we find both the Greek spirits changed into this letter: the lenis, as in ἔρμι sum, ὀπός sucus; the aspirate more frequently, as in ἄλς sal, ἕξ sex, ἑπτά septem. This may likewise have occasioned the neglect of it by the Romans in taking words from the Greeks, as in tigo, falio, from τέγω, σφάλλω, and sometimes in derivatives of their own, as in pumex from stuma. Certain it is that some learned men among the Greeks avoided a frequent use of it. Plato and Eubulus, two comick poets, made sport in the theatre with this verse of Euripides, "Ἔσωσα σ' ὡς ἴσασιν Ἕλλήνων ὄσοι." Yea Pindar was so unjustly severe, that he writ several odes without it: and the whole Spartan nation preferred the canine snarl of P to the serpentine hiss of S. The Romans also melted it so much, especially in the end of words, as scarcely to be heard; insomuch that even in writing before the interrogative ne, the comick poets neglect it, as in audin'? credin'? dabin'? for audisne, &c. and Virgil avoided ending a word with this letter, and beginning the following word with the same, as, Dispectus tibi sum, nec qui sum, quæris, Alexi; oratours also forbid this in their compositions. Yea the ancient poets, in imitation of the Greeks, when they pleased, cut it off in the end of a word before a short, and sometimes even before a long, syllable in the following word, as is manifest in that of Ennius, Egregè cordatus homo catu' Ælius Sextus. And not only Ennius, Nævius, and Pacuvius do this, but Catullus; and even Cicero hath not altogether denied himself the liberty. But though in general this sound may seem to have been unpleasant to both nations, it has without doubt in its proper place its particular graces, and the most that is said against it regards chiefly its too frequent, or improper, use. The Latins, in making some Greek words denizens of Rome, prefix this letter, as in scribo, smaragdus, stella, from γράφω, μάσραγδος, τέλλω; and even st anciently, as in stitem, stocum, and that too in words of their own tongue: sometimes they interpose it, as in discus, musca, from δίσκος, μύσκα. The Greeks also in Latin names of men ending in a add this letter, as Νεμῶς, Φιμβρίας, for Numa, Fimbria. In Tully's time, and a while after, this letter was doubled, as in caussa, cassus, for causa, casus, vid. Quint. 1, 7. In conjugateing Latin verbs, it is substituted for almost all the consonants, as in arsti from ardeo, tersti from tergeo, vexi for vecsi, from vecho, vulsi from wello, pressi from premo, posui from pono, repsi from repo, torsti from torqueo, ussi from uro, versum from verti, as grammarians observe; but this to me seems not so much a substitution, as a servile formative power given it in Latin, as, I have observed before, it had in the Greek tongue. This semivowel, for so the Latins seem to acknowledge it, by prefixing i as they do before the other liquids, admitteth after it of the mutes c, p, q, t, as in scapha, spes, squalor, stadium, but none of the liquids, except m, and that chiefly, if not only, in words derived from the Greek tongue. Concerning the intercourse between this, and its neighbour R, see that letter. S. in proper names, is read Sextus; Sp. Spurius. In appellatives, S. A. Secundum artem; SC. Senatusconsultum; S. P. Q. R. Senatus populuf- que Romanus; S. S. S. Stratum super stratum; *S. V. B. E. E. Q. T Latin and English, whereof the former took its figure without any variation from the Greek capital, the latter, with a very small difference, from the lesser Greek character of most common use. They have indeed another small τ, but rejected by the Latins, in this form τ, which seems rather ornamental than necessary, being chiefly used in conjunction with the other small τ. And as the Latins from the Greeks, so the Greeks borrowed theirs from the ancient Hebrew, namely the Samaritan character of the same form; save that the transverse plank lay not quite on the top of the erect stulp, but across it a little lower, thus, †: which very form is retained still in the smaller form of the Latin, and other cognate languages; in which figure also it was worn on the foreheads of the primitive Christians. This letter is called by the Hebrews אין tau, which signifieth an extremity or bound, because it is the last in their alphabet, as also the last consonant in the Cadmean, and indeed properly the last in the more modern Greek; for φ and χ, which follow, are not properly letters, but notes expressive of two letters, and of no use in the times of the first alphabet, the former being then written by ΓΗ or ΒΗ, the latter by ΚΗ or ΤΗ; which may also be said of ψ, the compendary note of ΠΣ, ΒΣ, and ΦΣ. In the Latin alphabet only κ and ξ stand after it, the former of which is an abbreviature of ΚΣ, ΓΣ, or ΑΣ; the latter of ΤΣ, ΔΣ, or ΘΣ, as will be showed more fully in the dissertation upon those two letters. To proceed; this letter hath the first place in the third rank of the mutes, which admit of changes into, and perform mutual offices for, one another. These changes are indeed most frequent in the same rank, because nearest in found to each other. Ex. gr. in the first rank p is only a softer b, and b a harder p, as in scribo, scripsi, scriptum; nubo, nupsi, nuptum; in the second order c a softer g, and g a harder c, as in tego, tepsi, tectum; jungo, junxi, junctum: which changes are plainly made only for the better found, the harder mute before a vowel passing into the softer before a consonant; as is likewise done in the first and second conjugation of the Greeks, as in λέγω, λεπσω, λέγω, λέψω. In this third order, indeed, these changes in forming tenses are not frequent in either of these languages, but in derivations of Latin words from Greek such a reciprocation is very common; thus, as from βατῶ and νάτω are derived vado and cado, so vice versa from ἴδον and μύδω are made intus and mutus. The same is observed in Latin derivatives from primitives of the same: thus, as from mulo and viduo are made matula and vitrum; and as in composition, for the more easy found, d before t is continually changed into t, as in attendo, attenuo, and their derivatives; so also from mentior and quatuor come mendax and quatuor; and we may add, that our English tongue sometimes softens the Latin d into this letter, as in at, it, what, from ad, id, quid. But as all the orders have a mutual commerce with one another, this letter, though less frequently, and her letters of the first and second order, correspond: for as terebra comes from τέρεβρον, so tussis is from βήσσω; as procures from προκρεπε, so bestia from βόσκημα. Nor do these mutual offices between this mute and the sisterhood, hinder her good correspondence with two of the liquids, l and n. For as mitis is from μείλιχος, so volo, are, is from πείλω, πειῶ, as clivella from κλίω, so pinus from πινυς. And there is the same agreement between this letter and the solitary s in Latin words of Greek extraction, where their civilities are only mutual; for as from nausea comes nausia, so from myrtus comes myrsin; but in words purely Greek, t so far intruded into the property of her neighbour s, that the latter was forced to bring her writ of ejection before the tribunal of the vowels, with a design to hang T on her own gibbet, as Lucian jocosely says; but being consulted by the prevailing power of the Athenian eloquence, meditated revenge, and made reprisals by the help of a barbarous nation, who, though they left t in possession, gave her power away to s, in more instances, both in her own and the conquered Roman dominions, than she could pretend her neighbour had invaded her right in, viz. that wherever t came before the third vowel, another vowel following, s, under a very few restrictions, should take her power. And the grammarians, who ought to have opposed this usurpation, confirmed it; and well it was for the Greek tongue, that the Goths understood nothing of it, and the grammarians at that time very little; for how absurd would it have been to have read αἰσις, ωσιον, for αἰσις, ωσιον, &c. which would seem equally absurd in Latin, if we did not submit to a barbarous prescription. But to proceed; this mute admits after it in the beginning of pure Latin words of the liquids very seldom any other but r. The ancients indeed in a few words beginning with l, prefixed st, as in stiles, stlocum, for lites, locum, &c. which is now obsolete. But in Greek words, not only l, but m follow t, as in Tlepolemus, tmefis. In the beginning it takes before it in Greek words c and p, as in Ctesippus, Ptelon; as also in the middle of Latin words in different syllables, as in factus, captus, as not only the dividing such words requires, but reason, for fac and cap are radical, but tus servile terminations. T. a significant note, Titius, Titus, Tullius; TAB. Tabularius; TAB. V.

V v, the twentyeth letter in the Latin alphabet, answers to the sixth Hebrew letter ו, and being conformable to that in power, is both a vowel and consonant; but as to its figure, it was, A. C. 306, or thereabout, thus varied, V, v, u, u, according to Dr. Bernard, in his Literature of the learned world. In the Hebrew, indeed, the vowel points determine its sound; for they being under it make it a consonant, as in וואו ולא ושב vau, velo, vishab, but a vowel when over it, as in וי; or in the middle, as in ויבנה ubene. The Greeks admit only this latter use; as also our Saxon ancestors, who commonly substitute f in the place of v, as in fif, reofin, five, seofen, as we find in very ancient manuscripts; and sometimes u, as Leui Lewi; notwithstanding which they sounded such words as we do now, otherwise no change of the figure had been made in after times. But though they gave this letter no place in their alphabet, they admitted it among their numerals; herein imitating the Greeks, who had made it a numeral only, calling it Βαυ ἐπίσημον. To begin with the consonant: As to the figure, it is by some thought to be made from the Greek γ, by cutting off the shank; though the great Scaliger supposed this was rather made from that, by adding the stem: but it seems plain, the reason for this supposition, was his ascribing to the Farnesian monument a higher antiquity than he ought. As to his Proof from ΑΥΥCTOC being found on a Greek coin, it is very weak; because all antiquaries know, that it was not unusual for the Greeks, after they came under the Roman power, to mix Latin letters among their own in coins and inscriptions, especially in Latin words. Marius Victorinus also is against him, and Ausonius expressly saith, Cecropiis ignota viris ferele sonans V. But though it be true that the Greeks had not the letter, yet it is plain that they, at least the Æolians, had the Name, and gave it the same place as a numeral in their units, viz. 6, as it held in the mother alphabet, calling it Βαυ ἐπίσημον, as likewise Κόππα (90) in their tens, and Σάν πῖ or (900) in their hundreds; being the only three Hebrew letters, ז, פ, ו, which they had no occasion for in their alphabet. Nor had they the name only, but the form also from the Hebrew ו, turning it to the right, and bowing its body, so that its appearance was somewhat like the contracted mark ε, which therefore is now used for it. To proceed, from the name and figure, which are only accidents, to its power, which is the essence of a letter: As it is now pronounced, I think corruptly, it is a mute of the first rank, being of a middle sound between b and f, harder than the former, and softer than the latter, aspirating B, as φ doth Π; and according to Priscian and Donatus, is no other than the Æolian digamma. But if the digamma be the Latin F, as they will have it, and a different power make a different letter, as surely it doth, F and V are two different sounds, and consequently different letters. This is plain from our own tongue, for we neither found nor write knifes, or lifts, though we do knife and life. I mean, as now pronounced; for it is very likely that before a vowel in the same syllable, both in the primitive and derivative tongues, it had the sound of our w in the same position, as in wall, wen, wine, worm, from vallum, vena, vinum, vermis, Vid. Scal. Not. ad Euseb. & Lips. de L.L. pronunciatione. Yea, in Latin words, after g, q, and f, we give it the sound of w; as in lingua, sequor, suadeo, where w is melted indeed into the vowel following, but strengthens the sound. That it is not purely a vowel, its resolution into a vowel, frequently made by the poets, seems to evince; as in solvit, Catull. siluæ, Hor. This consonant precedes any vowel in the beginning, middle, or end, of words. It is easily changed into its sister mutes, p and b: for as from ovis comes opilio, from dubius, duvius; so from verpus is made vervex, and from γίλως gilvus. Thus much may suffice for the name, figure, and sound of the consonant, in the ancient Latin. We next proceed to the sound of the vowel, as now distinct from the consonant, both in figure and power. The inconvenience of expressing two different sounds by the same letter, was observed by Claudius Cæsar, who endeavoured to remove it, by introducing F the Æolian digamma instead of it; which in publick records obtained a while. But a very usefull, though late, invention has applyed an effectual remedy, by taking from the former the vocal, and from the latter the consonant, power; so that now U is a vowel when it maketh a syllable alone, or cometh before a consonant in the same syllable: and as such hath a mutual intercourse with all the vowels. For as from κάλιξ cometh calix, from μυδάω madeo; so from κέπαλον proceeds capulus, from κραπάλη crapula: as from ἱέλιξ ilex, from ἐνυγός jocer; so from νέφος nubes, from σκοπέλον scopulus. As from φύω fio, from σῦψω slipo; so from γλῖα gluten, from χάρης carus; as from ἀγυρὰ anchora, from νύξ nox; so from φῦρ fur, from ἀμυρῆν amurca. As solvit dissolved is solvit, silva silva; so nervus is made from νεῦρον. Nor is it only related to the vowels, but to the diphthongs also. Thus from φαίς comes fiscus, from καίρω curro, from λάγυνον lagena, from ἄξ sextarius. By this letter also sometimes the Greek σ is expressed in Latin, as duplus from διπλῆς, Urania from Οὐρανία, u being equipollent in sound to that diphthong, as Terentianus Maurus has observed, saying, Oū literis nostris vacat, quod hunc V compleat satis sonum; which seems rather adapted to the vowel, than the consonant sound of this letter, according to the modern pronunciation. But if we admit, as we before hinted, that V in Latin was founded as our W, the difference in sound is not so great. In gerunds and participles, this vowel was by the ancients substituted for e; as, ad faciundum; mos gerundus est; also in many adjectives of the superlative degree, this custom generally obtained till C. Cæsar's time, when they first began to write by the middle vowel, optimus, maximus, for optumus, maxumus, as we learn from Fabius, l. 1, 7. Significant notes with the initial V. V. A. X Latin, Ξ Greek. This letter, though both in the alphabetical series and as a numeral, it answer to the Hebrew D, denoting sixty in that tongue, as this doth in Greek, yet undoubtedly in power comes nearer the harder sound of ψ, schin, which probably stood most anciently in this place, till it was usurped by the introduction of the secondary D. Neither hath it only the power, but the form of ψ also; being made by erecting the plane or flat, and turning it to the right, to comply with the western way of writing. The Hebrews call it schin, i. e. a tooth, from its dental figure; and if you prostrate ξ thus α, you will perfectly see the teeth of a saw. The name Ξ, also, as well as the power and sound, is taken from schin, by removing the last consonant, analogically to what the Greeks did in adopting other letters, or rather by anastrophe, cs for sc. For as from mem and nun, are made my, ny, so from schin is made xi. The Latin letter take its power, and name indeed, from the Greek; but its form is the same with the capital Greek X Chi, and is sometimes resolved into it, as in ἀκρόνυχον, qu. ἀκρὴ νύξ; and from future tenses in εἶω, and præter tenses formed in χα, as πλέκω, πῆπλεχα, λέγω, λέλεχα; and that into this; the Atticks saying διξά and τριξά, for δῖχα and τριῖχα. It is a double consonant, compounded of the second order of the mutes κ, γ, χ, and the formative σ; as in πλέκω, πῆπλεξω; λέγω, λέξω; ἔχω, ἔξω. The ancient Atticks long used the single letters, writing πλέκω, λέγω, ἔχω; and the ancient Æolians never used this conjunction, as neither did the Romans universally: for Nigidius Figulus, who, next to Varro, was in greatest reputation for his learning, refused to use it at all, as Victorinus acquainteth us. And Fabius Inst. Or. I. 4. saith, they might have been without it. For all words might have been written as we find apex, gregs. And Cicero telleth us, it was left out in many words, to give them an easer sound; as in ala, velum, &c. for axilla, vexillum, &c. The later Athenians, on the other hand, used ξ instead of σ, especially in the beginning of words, as tempering the serpentine hiss of σ, which grated upon their ears, as we have shown in our dissertation on that letter. And the Dorians also imitated them in the end of words; as in ὄρνιξ for ὄρνις, κλάξ for κλείς. The same also they did in the futures, and first aorists of verbs baryton of the fourth conjugation; as in καθίξω, ἐκάθιξα, for καθίσω, ἐκάθισα, &c. On the other hand, the Latins sometimes substituted this letter for the Greek final σ, writing pistrix and Ajax for πίστις and Ἄϊας. This double letter in declining nouns, often loseth its s; as in fax, facis; rex, regis; crux, crucis. In numerals it expresseth ten, whence in old Roman manuscripts it is used for denarius, and as such seems to be made of V and Λ joined, i. e. twice five. X. P. Decem pondo, or decem pedes; XV. Decemviri.

† Xystios, i. f. [qu. ξυστῆς, rasilis] An ordinary stone in the Indies, of the jasper kind, Plin. 37, 9.

* Xystum, i. n. & Xystus, i. m. [ξύστυν, vel ξυστῆς, Gr. ἀ ξύω, rado, polio] A walking place, or gallery, in summer, or fair weather; also where men used wrestling, or other exercise in the winter; a close walk to walk in, out of the sun and rain, Vitruv. 5, 11. & 6, 1. Cic. Att. 1, 8.

Υ, a Greek vowel, the figure whereof Palamedes is said to have taken from the flight of cranes, according to Philostrophus; but surely this must be a mistake as to Palamedes, because we find it in the Sigeon monument still in being, graven when the Greeks had only the sixteen letters which Cadmus brought into Greece. The two horns, as the old epigram calleth them, or branches, as Persius, were chosen by Pythagoras to demonstrate the easy descent to vice on the left, and the difficult ascent to virtue on the right; from whence it is called his letter. The ancient figure plainly shows, that the Latin V was taken from it, being exactly the same with it in figure. And perhaps V was anciently by the Latins substituted for it, as we see in many words; as in cubus, duo, mus, sus, ruo, &c. from υβος, δύω, &c. and this they did anciently in words which were afterwards written by the υ, as in Musia, Suria, for Myisia, Syria: but instances in these words are fewer. It is certain the Latin V had in many words a deeper sound than the Greek V, and therefore was not the same letter, but nearer to their ov; forasmuch as Βεῦτος, Ἰώνιος, were written by the Greeks for Brutus, Junius: yea the ancient Latins writ ou for u long, as in loumen, joure, for lumen, jure. The Latins have no capital of this letter, because they do not want it: for the Greeks aspirate all words beginning with υ; but the Romans owning an aspiration for a letter, as indeed it is, and always was, with them, prefix h before such words as they take, or borrow, from them; and therefore are all marshalled under it. But the smaller y they have from the Greek υ, by obliqueing its stem, and use it in the middle and end of words, as in Cayster, corymbus; or end, as onyx, martyr. Our mother tongue, in the beginning of words and syllables, admits it as a consonant, as in yarn, yest, yoke, unyoked, but otherwise as a vowel.

Z ζ Greek; Z z when borrowed by the Latins to express Greek words; ז Hebrew. This letter is called a double consonant, whereof the Greeks have three, ζ, ψ, and Z: the two former were of later invention, but this stood in the ancient alphabet, as appears by the citation of Pliny, Lib. VII. c. 56, out of Aristotle, notwithstanding the corrupt reading even in the best edition of Pliny, where ζ is put for Z, and Z for ζ, as the learned Salmasius observed, and after him the great Spanhemius. This mistake seems purely to have been occasioned by the Roman librarians, who mistook the one for the other. The ancient figure of this letter was , and by obliqueing the perpendicular hath its present form. Its sound, now unknown, was between the Phoenician zain and the Latin G; which, though late, took its original from thence. Hence G is sometimes changed into it, as in ὀλίγον, which the Ionians used for ὀλίγον; and φύζω for φύγω. So the Dorians writ ζεύω for γεύω. The Latins also used indifferently zingiber or gingiber, for the Arabian word written by the Greeks ζιγγίβερι. That this letter had a very sweet sound, is certain from the authority of Dion. Halicarnassius, Περὶ Συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων. And Fabius supposed that the Roman could never arrive at the sweetness of the Greek elocution, because it wanted y and z, which he calls the sweetest of all their letters, Inst. Or. XII. c. 10. For the same reason, one would think it could not have the sound of a double consonant. For if it were pronounced as the Æolians and Dorians writ δσ, or σδ, as in δσυχός, for ζυχός, δσέυς or σδέυς for ζεύς, τράπισδα for τράπεισα, &c. it must be very hard, especially when a consonant followed, as ζμερδνός, smilaces. Its Hebrew mother ז, is certainly a single consonant, as z is also in our English tongue, where we sometimes join two of them together, as muzzle, puzzle, &c. The Latins likewise often put d or g for this letter, as in nidor, from νίζα; harpago, from ἀρπάζω. The Greeks change it also into σ, as in the first future tense of the fourth conjugation; or rather exclude it before the formative σ, as in σώζω, σώσω. The Latins indeed often put s for it, as in patriſſo, pitiſſo, from πατρίζω, πινίζω: and sometimes also substituted j, as being near in sound to g, as in jugum, from ζυχός. In Greek numerals it denoteth vii, though it be only the sixth letter, because ς is interposed in the numerical alphabet.
